The company paid me $10.82. Their rules are to cancel a small print within 2 weeks without any additional charge. We're checking the collection, but there's nothing yet that's all right. But we only got one bottle. After we finished the bottle I Emailed customer service and told him to cancel my order because I would no longer buy another bottle. When customer service emailed me back and told me they would be charging me $59.99 to cancel plus another $15 to ship back empty bottles. We're checking the collection to get one bottle and not. I called customer service to cancel and he told me the same thing and said we've already been charged $59.99 for the cancellation. I went to the bank and cancelled my card because they ask me for money for products that I could not even and do not let ... Forskolin is made from a tank plant in the peppermint family. The plant grows in Nepal, India and Thailand. It has long been used in traditional Ayurvedic medicine. People take forskolin supplements for a number of reasons. But very little important evidence to back its use for any medical condition. Some studies suggest that forskolin can help with weight loss and muscle building. In one very small study, overweight and obese men took 250 milligrams of 10% forskolin extract twice a day. After 12 weeks, they lost more body fat and had a higher increase in testosterone levels compared to similar men taking placebo. However, more research needs to be done to confirm these results and to ensure safety. Forskolin has a long history as a folk tool for asthma. Some studies support this. Forskolin appears to work in a way similar to certain types of conventional drugs, increasing the level of a compound called cyclic AMP. It helps to relax the muscles around the bronchi to make breathing easier. Forskolin has also been used to treat glaucoma. A small study suggests that forskolin may help relieve pressure on the eyes, which is often seen as glaucoma. It has also been found to be a safe alternative to beta-blockers in patients with glaucoma who have co-filling asthma. Another possible use of forskolin is for people with idiopathic congestive cardiomyopathy, which can cause heart failure. In a small study, patients who took forskolin via IV showed improved cardiac function. Optimal doses of forskolin have not been established under any conditions. As with food supplements in general, the quality and quality of active products that contain forskolin vary from maker to maker. Some experts recommend that forskolin be taken only under the supervision of a health care professional. Although forskolin does not come from the herb, it has been studied only as an extract. There is no evidence of the potential benefits of the whole herb. It is not known whether taking forskolin is safe as it has not been thoroughly investigated. Some negative reactions to forskolin have been reported. These include: Flushing, rapid heartbeat, and low blood pressure, when taken through IV Upper respiratory tract irritation, cough, tremor, and restlessness, when inhaled Singing eyes and enlargement of blood vessels in the eyes Headache People who take blood thinners or antiplatelet drugs should not take forskolin. Also, certain high blood pressure medications may interact with forskolin, including: Beta-blockers calcium channel blockers Clonidine Hydralazine Avoid forskolin if you are taking such medications. Forskolin should also be avoided in patients with polycystic kidney disease. Forskolin is not known in breast-feeding women, so they should avoid it. Talk to your doctor about the potential risks before taking forskolin or another food supplement. SOURCES: NYU Langone Medical Center: Coleus Forskohlii. Godard, M. Obesity Research, August, 2005.
